

Orchestras at a Glance

November 2016 (reporting on FY2013-14)

Orchestras are a vital part of America's musical landscape and civic life.

America is brimming with extraordinary musicians, live concerts, and orchestras as unique as the communities they serve. Orchestral music making is flourishing in our country, encouraging creativity and bringing people together to share the experience of live music. Orchestras fuel local economies, attract new business development, educate young people, and—through the power of music—unite individuals and cultures in times of public celebration and healing.

Orchestras serve communities large and small.

Orchestras exist in all 50 states, serving virtually every community, with annual budgets ranging from less than $30,000 to more than $100 million. Two thirds of all orchestras have budgets under $300,000.¹

Orchestras are 501(c)(3) nonprofit organizations.

The impact orchestras create in communities nationwide is supported by a critical combination of public and private support. Orchestras are not supported by ticket sales alone. As members of the nonprofit charitable sector, orchestras depend upon private philanthropy and civic support to fuel programs that serve community needs.

Orchestra expenses totaled more than $1.8 billion in FY2014.

Their economic impact exceeds several times that amount as orchestras create jobs, engage in commerce with local businesses, and spur local expenditures on related goods and services (hotels, restaurants, parking, and more).

In 2013-14, an estimated 105,000 musicians performed in some 1,600 orchestras across the United States. Orchestras offered over 28,000 performances - of which about 28% were free of charge - and reached 24.9 million people.

Why does a community support its orchestra?

Orchestras contribute to healthy societies through their increasingly active participation in civic life. The presence of an orchestra is often an indicator of a community's economic and cultural strength, as communities with orchestras tend to draw volunteers, voters, philanthropists, and other active, civic-minded participants. From a survey of 800 random households in 10 American cities², the vast majority of citizens believe that the presence of live, professional performing arts in the community:

- Improves quality of life
- Promotes understanding of other cultures
- Fosters pride in the community
- Contributes to the education and development of children and adults

Orchestras are active participants in international cultural exchange.

In 2014 alone, orchestras in communities across the United States are estimated to have engaged international guest artists on more than 1,500 occasions for multiple concerts and community engagement activities.³ These artists—such as composers, conductors, instrumentalists, and vocalists—perform alongside U.S. musicians for concert audiences and in school and community settings. By inviting international musicians to perform and collaborate, orchestras provide American audiences with the opportunity to experience a diversity of musical talent and encourage a supportive climate for U.S. orchestras to perform abroad. Six adult orchestras that reported the results of their 2013-14 international tours performed 60 concerts for more than 100,000 attendees.⁴ American youth orchestras also tour internationally, providing young U.S. musicians the chance of a lifetime to perform in the world's greatest venues and to engage in cultural exchange with young people from diverse countries and cultures.

What role do orchestras play in community engagement?

Orchestras provide lifelong musical experiences and participation in the creative process. They enhance the quality of life in their communities by collaborating with school systems and other local partners to deliver a wide array of community programs. Reports from 98 of the more than 1,200 orchestras across the U.S. indicate that those orchestras alone offered over 5,000 education and community engagement concerts and an additional 13,750 other activities and events in 2013-14, serving more than 2.1 million participants. Orchestras offer a wide variety of programs tailored to meet community needs, including pre-school learning, in-depth residencies in schools, afterschool partnerships in high-poverty communities, educational classes for seniors, and health and wellness programs.

How do orchestras increase access to music education for young people?

Music education is an indispensable part of life-long learning, and participation in music programs prepares students to succeed in school, work, and life. That's why the great majority of orchestras engage in advocacy on behalf of in-school music education in their communities. Also, kids "play their part" by joining an orchestra. Being part of an orchestra encourages young people to develop their talents and to experience teamwork, self-discipline, and individual expression. There are more than 400 youth orchestras across America,⁵ with new orchestras created each year to help meet the growing demand for music education and positive activities for young people. These orchestras involve over 40,000 young musicians in the joy of music making and all its ancillary benefits.

Leadership, Service, and Advocacy for America's Orchestras

The League of American Orchestras leads, supports, and champions America's orchestras and the vitality of the music they perform. Its diverse membership of more than 2,000 organizations and individuals across North America runs the gamut from world-renowned symphonies to community orchestras, from summer festivals to student and youth ensembles, from businesses serving orchestras to individuals who love symphonic music. Founded in 1942 and chartered by Congress in 1962, the League links a national network of thousands of instrumentalists, conductors, managers and administrators, board members, volunteers, and business partners.
